Bio: Timothy Ives works for the Rhode Island Historical Preservation and Heritage Commission where he serves as Principal Archaeologist. He earned anthropology degrees from the University of Connecticut (B.A. 1996; Ph.D. 2010) and the College of William & Mary (M.A. 2001). He worked for years in the field of cultural resource management and taught as an adjunct professor before accepting his current position in 2012. He is interested in several topics that intersect archaeology, particularly colonialism, environmental history, and contemporary identity politics.

Presentation:

Title: Historic Stone Walls in Rhode Island: An Economic Perspective

Synopsis: The networks of stone walls that extend across Rhode Island are more than quaint landscape accents. They are dynamic records of our shared past worth studying and preserving. Join Rhode Island state archaeologist Timothy Ives for an illustrated, one-hour presentation on the history and character of stone walls across the state.
